Fentanyl Soars to the Top

Synthetic opioids (like fentanyl) are now the number one cause of overdose deaths, affirms a report from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration. Fatalities rose an astounding 72 percent in just one year (2014 to 2015). The researchers also discovered that synthetic opioids, combined with another drug or alcohol, attributed to nearly 80 percent of overdose deaths in 2016.

Dealers are now mixing fentanyl with heroin, cocaine, and methamphetamine and pressing the opiate into counterfeit pills to intensify the high and increase the dealer’s net income. A recent traffic stop on Route 222, near the border of Berks and Lancaster counties, turned up 5,000 baggies of fentanyl-laced heroin worth $50,000, according to authorities.

While users may think they know what they are buying, the unknown makes it extremely dangerous. Fentanyl is difficult to identify since it basically has no taste, color, or odor. An overdose from this drug can occur in 60 seconds compared to an hour for pure heroin. Fentanyl is 50-100 times more powerful than heroin or morphine. In 2017, 66 percent of the overdose deaths in Philadelphia were positive for the opiate, a 44 percent increase from 2016. Last year, in the Lehigh Valley, at least 31 deaths were linked to fentanyl. In March, Governor Wolf classified it as a banned substance to help law enforcement curb its use.

The Brain on Pot

Adolescents who are habitual pot smokers scored much lower on memory, learning, and other cognitive tests than non-users did, concluded research published in JAMA Psychiatry: The Journal of the American Medical Association. The study—which examined the immediate impact of marijuana on the brains of young people—found that when these chronic consumers abstained for 72 hours, their cognitive level of non-users. Psychiatry at Rutgers-School, explained that capible to the drug be-the brain (reasoning and developed until age 25. lates the probability of decreases motivation, and becoming dependent on”

Even with that information, 13 states have decriminalized—not legalized—cannabis. Currently, Pennsylvania allows marijuana possession for medical purposes only. However, several cities across the state (Erie, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Harrisburg, York, and State College) have decided to stop arresting people for small amounts of pot. Joining those municipalities, Allentown City Council recently approved of an ordinance that permits individuals to have 30 grams or less within city limits. Bethlehem Mayor Ray O’Connell must sign off on the legislation or veto it in the next few days. Bethlehem City Council is considering a similar measure.

13 Reasons Why Returns

Last spring, Netflix broadcast the drama 13 Reasons Why, a controversial series that tackled suicide, bullying, and mental health. On May 18, the entertainment company released season 2. Mental health advocacy groups and suicide experts from around the world expressed their concerns about whether the series presented risks to some viewers because of certain issues. They asked Netflix to cover these complicated topics responsibly. In a recently released statement, these organizations conveyed their concerns to parents, educators, and professionals who work with youth. The complete response is available through this link: http://www.pasap.org/resources/Documents/13%20Reasons%20Why%20Pre-Release%20Statement_SAVE.pdf. There’s also a link to the “Suicide Awareness Voices of Education” website, including toolkits for youth, parents, families, and educators.
